

Should Pokémon cards be allowed in school

Pokémon cards have become a big part of playground life in many schools. While lots of children enjoy collecting and trading them, not everyone agrees they should be allowed at school.

Some people argue that the cards help children practise important skills. Organising collections, planning fair trades, and talking to others all support learning and social interaction. For some children, it's a way to connect with others and build confidence.

Others see things differently. There have been arguments, unfair trades, and even bullying. Some children have had their cards stolen or lost, which can be very upsetting. There's also the issue of inclusion—if a child doesn't have any cards, they might feel left out or sad during playtime.

Although Pokémon cards can offer great opportunities for learning and fun, I believe they should only be allowed with clear rules in place. That way, children can enjoy the experience without it causing harm.
